A Little Separation is a Good Thing

During the pandemic, it was necessary to separate people for their health. Plexiglass dividers and widening space between workspaces created needed distance and separation.

But separation was necessary before the pandemic and will continue to be necessary now that the pandemic is over.

For safety, dangerous machinery must be separated from people who are not using it. Evidence, inventory, and facilities must be protected from unauthorized access and people need to be separated for reasons of privacy and noise.

Separation is created through many mediums, styles, and materials. Modular offices, demountable walls, accordion/folding partitions, barrier walls, and driver access cages all provide necessary separation.

Seeking out a professional who has experience in designing (or redesigning) applications that require separation of people or goods will solve issues effectively, efficiently, and within budget.

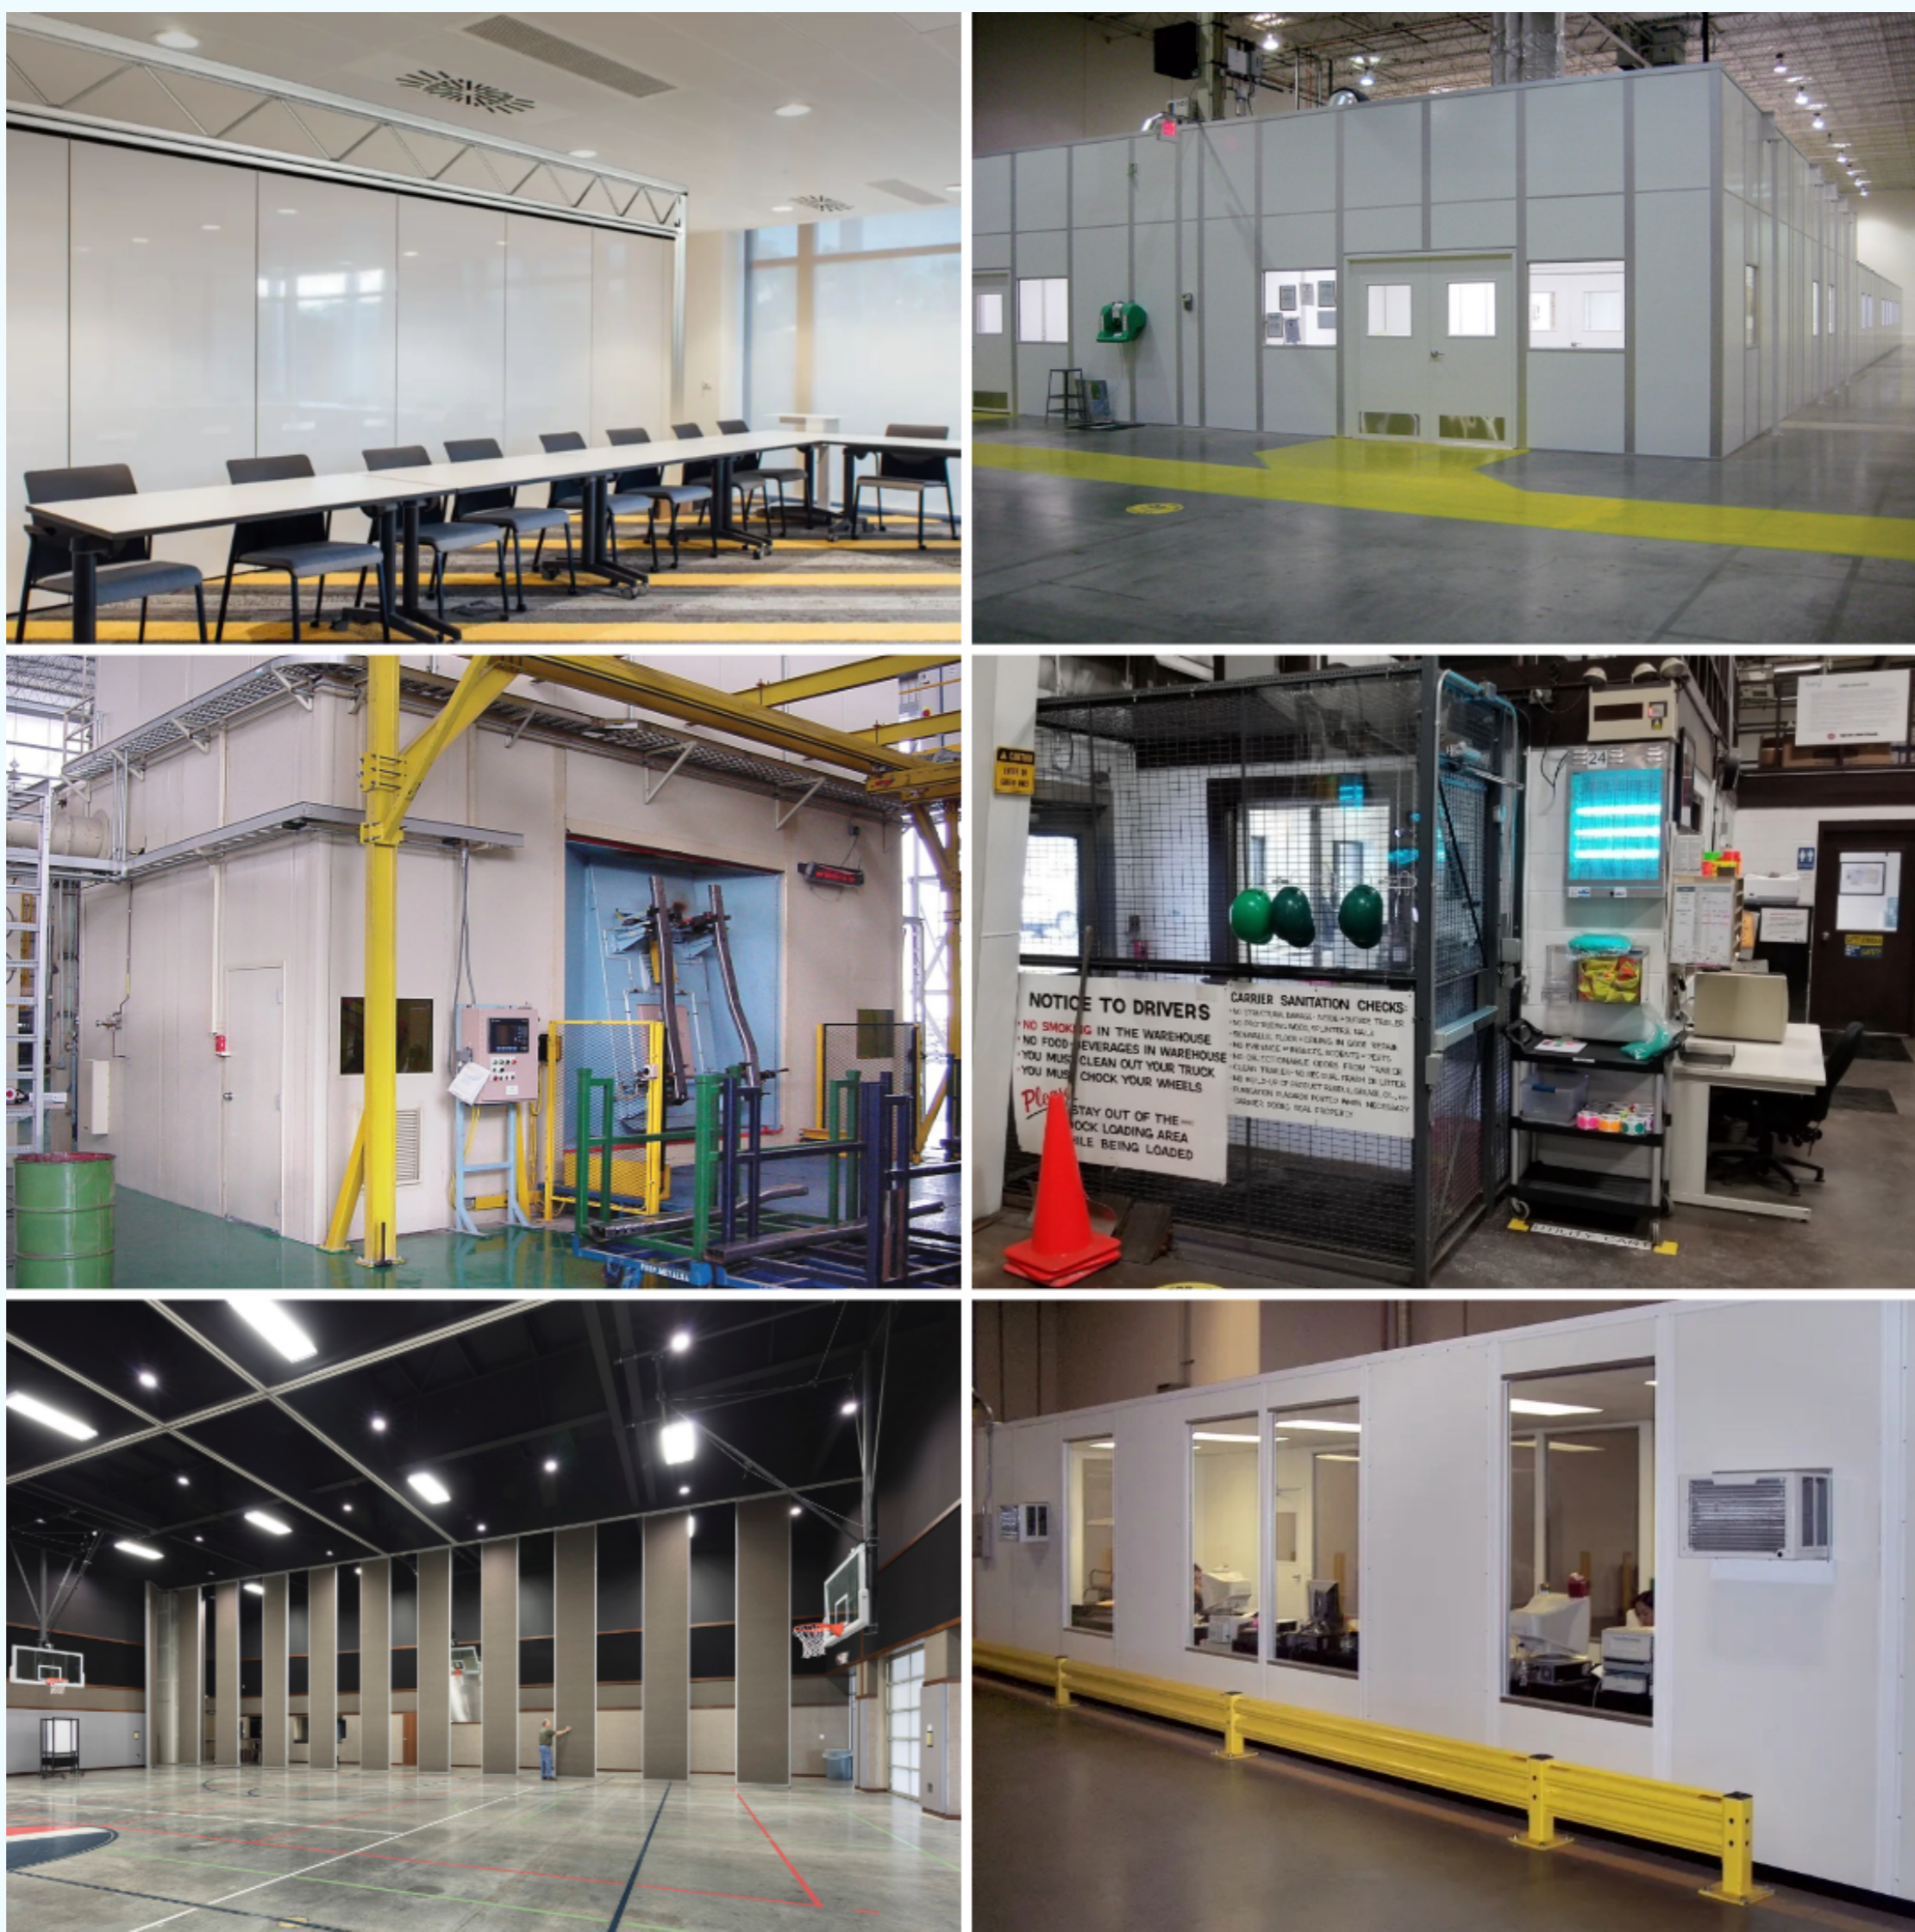

Creating Enclosed Space

Brick and mortar structures can be limiting. Stationary walls are expensive to move or may not be able to be moved at all, making expansion or reconfiguration of space difficult and costly.

Modular building systems, operable walls, and partition systems are constructed of high quality materials and are made to last. They are easy to customize, relocate, or reconfigure making them extremely versatile.

Divide or create rooms, move or build walls, and transform space into useful space.
